How to be a morning person

By ELLEN WHYTE

SCHEDULES being what they are, you're probably having to struggle with some morning classes. Here's how to get set up so you've tonnes of energy.

> Go to bed at the same time every night, and don't make it too late. Your body loves routine, so if you train yourself to go to bed at a reasonable hour, you can pack in enough rest. Aim for seven hours.

> Daylight activates the brain, just like darkness will help you sleep. If it's past dawn when you have to get up, open the curtains as soon as the alarm goes off so you make sure you get the benefit of the sun.

> Buy a coffee maker. There's nothing like waking up to the scent of fresh coffee in the morning. Buy an automated machine so you wake up to roasted beans. If coffee isn't your thing, make flavour-scented fruit tea.

> Lay out your clothes the night before. If you don't have to think about what you're wearing, you've time to wake up at your own pace. Also, pack your book bag the night before, including your pens, notes, etc. You'll be less stressed.

> Put together a play list of your favourite songs. Start with a soothing song to wake up to and follow it with songs that make you sit up and sing. Invest in a player with a timer and place it far away from the bed so you can't roll over and switch it off. That way you'll start the day in a positive mind.
